HOPE STAR, HOPE, ARKANSAS

Good Night, Sweet Prince

"No! My poor mother!" Butler cried.
In his brief career of artist, Jack Barrymore was hired and fired by both the Morning Telegraph and the New York Journal. But meanwhile, he had acquired a new bride, and she was not so easily let go.
Perhaps Jack's closest friend was Jack Butler, a reporter. One night Jack came upon the huge Butler after the latter had been evicted from a hotel for non-payment of rent. Butler, had, however, pawned a removable gold crown for seventy cents, of which he had 15 cents left. He spent five for a paper.
"If you will feed me," Jack said, "I'll shelter you at my studio. You'll find love with the place."
"Get out the proffer," said Mr. Butler. "It is the winter of my discontent."

Butler entered a lunchroom where hot cakes and two cups of coffee could be had for a dime. Jack watched from outside. After Butler finished half the cakes and one cup of coffee, Jack rushed in and whispered to him.
Butler sprang up crying. "No! My poor mother!"
Jack then sat down and gulped the residue.
When Butler arrived at the "studio" and saw its lack of furniture, he belatedly, "Sold out! Rooked!" But he finally lay down on the floor and slept.
In the days that followed, Jack set about repairing the flimsy reputation of the giant Butler who was always being beaten up by smaller men. He simply couldn't fight.
Jack looked up his pugilistic pal, Buffalo Costello, and offered two dollars if the fighter would let Butler knock him down in front of pop-eyed newspaper cronies.

Jack and Butler slept on the floor.

Costello charged in shouting, "Where's my two bucks?"
"For the moment, no. Left it in my other pants."
"You got other pants?" asked the suspicious ex-boxer.
Barrymore finally got the "olive" on credit and that afternoon a gallery saw Butler and Buffalo collide.
"Can't you see where you're going?" Butler roared, while onlookers chuckled. "Must be a citizen at the mercy of an ape-faced bum!" He swung a roundhouse right while Costello flopped in the gutter.
Astounded journalists were feting the suddenly popular Butler hours later when he was told a gentleman outside wanted to see him. "Send him packing," Butler roared, and offered two dollars if the fighter would let Butler knock him down in front of pop-eyed newspaper cronies.

HOPE STAR, HOPE, ARKANSAS

At the Saenger Sunday

Publication of the 3rd Biennial Report of the Arkansas State Library Commission reveals that the thirty-six entrprising Arkansas counties pioneering in county library service, operating on the principle that citizens in every part of a county from the poorest to the most affluent, rural and urban sections are entitled to the free access to books and reading materials. The Hempstead County Library is one of a network of thirty-six libraries which have sprung up over the state since the Arkansas State Library Commission was established in 1925. W. R. Waterbury, chairman of the State Library Commission, pointed out that in July 1937 Arkansas had only one county library, that in Jefferson County. Since that time the county library has proved so popular that almost every county in the state has established a library of this type. Thirty-nine counties remain without county libraries.

Expanding the county library, the State Library Commission has been working with two regional libraries. Working on the theory that the two most important factors in the development of a library service are the library and the community, the State Library Commission has been working with the two regional libraries, the Arkansas State Library and the Arkansas State Library.
